

Youth in Action: LIVE-Ex Climate Stories

New LIVE-Ex stories landed this month from Kenya, Togo, Malawi, Tanzania and Zimbabwe. Different countries, different methods, same conclusion: young people don't need to be convinced that climate action matters. They need the tools! Here's what they built. 🙌

Kenya: Turning climate information into action

Designer Reinhard Babere built Mazingira Yetu, a visual campaign that turns dense climate data into messages anyone can grasp in seconds, from students' social feeds to the community notice boards people actually stop at in rural areas.

Togo: 1,500 trees, 1,700 students, three schools

"One Student, One Tree" put seedlings in the ground across three schools in Kloto, then built permanent environmental clubs so the effort wouldn't fade into a one-day photo op once the assembly was over.

Malawi: Training climate advocates to tell the story

In Chikwawa, COFO trained 30 young people in solution journalism under the banner "Finding the Hope," teaching them to spot a local climate issue and publish it. Their stories are already live online.

Togo: Turning palm ribs into waste bins

At two schools in Kpalimé, students learned to build waste bins from palm leaf ribs and recycled materials, then passed the skills on to classmates and family, one small act of recycling at a time.

Tanzania: Where inclusion meets innovation

A Morogoro school competition brought 108 students and 72 persons with disabilities into the same space, and a mentee named Vedasto Mganga turned his LIVE-Ex prize into a project transforming discarded waste into useful products.

Zimbabwe: A greener schoolyard at Mutambara High

Students planted trees for shade and erosion control and pushed a cleaner-campus habit, discovering along the way that small shared actions move faster and go further than big ones attempted alone.
